

The headphones of Marley

It is strange, in a way, that it took me this long to discover TheHouseOfMarley, since I always loved good sounding speakers that suit my budget. But 2 years ago, I finally ordered my Exodus ANC headphones. They were more expensive than my previous ones, sure, but the sound was extremely good and the ANC absorbed noise much better than my old headphones did.

I was also amazed by how much less bad those products are for the environment. Materials are mostly either recycled or fast growing like bamboo, and the profits benefit tree planting and ocean cleaning projects.

A lot has happened since I first experienced the HouseOfMarley signature sound, and friends of mine got themselves newer products from the brand. They are still sustainable, way cheaper in price, and the fit and finish is even better than it was 2 years ago. However, the new ANC is simply on a different level now, and the sound actually made my old HouseOfMarley headphones boring.

Not only that, but the Redemption2 ANC in ear headphones are among the first products by TheHouseOfMarley which support the app, with control over ANC and Ambient Mode, an equalizer and the ability to update the firmware OTA ones updates are ready. The swipe and push function on the in ears can also be configured over the app.

In essence

TheHouseOfMarley headphones feel like your favorite music fills the entire room. The base is amazing and the highs are very precise. Real quite parts sound as powerful as they should and battery life, fit and finish and also the look and feel are amazing. This all builds up on a sustainable mindset with the spirit of your favorite tracks in mind.
